LEGISLATIVE COMMENT

By LEWIS H. MACHEN.

THE CONCLUDING WEEK

Pusuant to the custom of ep'tomiz-voted for it on this account, ag each week's legislative work in standing doubts which they pands and the demands for legislation are proportionably increased. Two calendars fairly well filled with bills, all of which had been carefully considered by committees, and some of which had been favorably passed upon by one house or the other, failed of passage only because the seasion was too short. It may be true that some of these might have been unwise measures and might nevertheless have been enacted. Yet that is a danger which is incident to popular Legislatures and cannot be removed without abolishing those institutions, which few in this period of our history are bold enough to advocate, though many doubtless secretly desire it. The loubtless secretly desire
